ALL BECAUSE OF A KEY

FOR the seventh time, Mrs. William Haber repeated the instructions to her daughter. It was the first time they were going to leave Ruth alone in the house. Mrs. Haber would have felt better had her daughter gone over to Elsie's house. But since Elsie was in the country this was impossible. And Ruth was having a date with young Ben Wolin.

"We have locked and bolted the front door to the house. All the windows are securely locked. You will leave and return home by the rear door. Say goodnight to your escort outside of the house. Am I clear?"

"Yes, mother dear," repeated Ruth for the seventh time. What was so dangerous about letting a sixteen year old girl stay at home alone in a peaceful town like Centerport? In fact, Ruth felt like giving her mother and father some advice. They were going to spend the night in the big city. There were pickpockets, hold-up men, gamblers, swindlers, and reckless motorists who might take advantage of them.

"I don't feel so good about not taking Ruth with us," said Mrs. Haber to her husband as he was trying to drive the car, watch a big truck hog the road, and wondering whether or not it would rain. "It is the first time we ever did this."

"Stop worrying," recommended her husband. "Ruth is a young lady, not a baby. Just remember you were sixteen when we became engaged. And we were married a year later."

"You don't think that Ruth will fall in love with this Wolin boy?" asked Mrs. Haber. "After all, what do we really know about him? Only that he is a house guest of the Stillman's. Ruth met him at Janice's party and he asked for this date. But I'm certain that Ruth would only go out with nice boys."

Ben Wolin parked his car outside the Haber home. And there on the porch was a beautiful girl waiting for him. He walked up to her and bowed gallantly.

"Do I see a dream in front of me? Or some beautiful princess who is waiting for her knight in the latest model of motorized horses? May I go inside and bid the greetings of the day to the parents of such a fair maiden as you?"

"Mother and Dad aren't inside," explained Ruth. "They went to the city and locked and bolted the front door. You'll have to bring me home via the back door."

Ruth had to admit it was a nice convertible that Ben was driving. She sat back and relaxed as he drove out of the town and headed for the back road.

"Not that I'm a bit curious but would you give me a hint of where we are going?" ventured Ruth.

"They opened a new drive-in movie at Bridgeport," replied Ben. "We'll see the latest picture with Helene Dargent. And then we'll have a bite to eat and I should have you home before the wicked hour of midnight."

Even though it was a Friday night the new drive-in movie wasn't crowded. It was a good picture but Ruth found it hard to concentrate on the adventures of a female spy. She found her eyes looking at Ben.

"He must be a nice boy," she found herself talking to herself. "He sits there next to me like a perfect gentleman. I hope to meet him again. Too bad he doesn't live in our community. Comes from some place out on the west coast."

When the picture was over Ben drove to a roadside stand and they ate their fill of hot dogs and hamburgers. Then on the way home he tuned in Jed Zindler's band on the radio. There was a sudden break in the radio program.

"Sorry to interrupt," said the announcer, "But we have a special flash. Mike Pipitone, the Baby-Faced Bandit, is said to be in the vicinity of Centerport driving a stolen convertible. Be on your guard. If you see him call Police Headquarters. That is all!"

Ruth took a close look at Ben and then asked the inevitable question.

"You don't happen to be this Baby-Faced Bandit in disguise, do you? Because if you are, it would spoil a perfect evening. And you didn't steal the car, did you?"

"I studied English and received and A in it," retorted Ben, "but somehow questions like you ask always puzzle me. You ask it in the negative and then throw in a positive at the end. I have to be careful how I answer you. Otherwise I might acknowledge I am that wanted desperado."

Ben drove the car up to the front of the Haber home and then escorted Ruth to the back. She opened her purse to look for the key and couldn't find it. After three tries she came to an important decision.

"Hold your two hands together and I'll dump the contents of my purse. I know I have that key. Oh, this is terrible."

Item by item, Ben returned them to Ruth's purse. Alas, that key wasn't among the many items found in her purse. There was just a trace of mist in Ruth's eyes.

"What am I going to do?" she pleaded. "Either Mother didn't give me the key or I lost it somehow."

"We can drive over to the Stillman's," suggested Ben. "They have several guest rooms. You can stay with them until tomorrow. Or if you give me permission I think I can jimmy open this back window."

"Go ahead and try it," replied Ruth. And the moment she said those words she was sorry. What if he were the Baby-Faced Bandit? Ben went over to his car and returned with some tools. In exactly two minutes he forced open the window.

"You did it just like a professional," she admitted half aloud. And then she added. "But I know you never did a dishonest thing in your life."

Suddenly a light was flashed into their eyes. A police officer appeared in front of them.

"My first night on the force," he exclaimed, "And what do I find? The Baby-Faced Bandit. They didn't tell me he had a female with him on these jobs."

Ruth had to keep cool. She turned to the officer and managed to say in a very sad tone of voice that showed she was frightened.

"My name is Ruth Haber. I live here. This is my home. My parents went to the city and locked the front door. They gave me a key to the back door but I haven't got it."

"Suppose I check on both of you. I'll drive you down to Police Headquarters and you can tell your story to the chief. So both of you get into my car."

There wasn't a word of protest as they both sat next to the police officer. He drove down Main Street and suddenly Ben shouted to him.

Look at the man coming out of that restaurant. He has a gun in his hand and he is running to his convertible."

The officer slammed on his brakes and came to a dead stop. His gun was out of his holster. He turned to the two in his car and said.

"Sit still you two kids. I don't want you to get hurt." Then he dashed out of the car towards the man with the gun in his hand. The man fired once at the officer. Ruth took her purse and threw it at the man. It hit him on the side of the eye and the officer got his man. There was great excitement at Police Headquarters.

"If it weren't for the girl throwing her purse, I would be a dead duck," admitted the policeman. "That was the Baby-Faced Bandit."

"If it weren't for a mother's mistake in thinking she gave you the key," said Mrs. Haber, "Maybe the bandit would not be in jail now."

"Is my face almost red," admitted the Chief of Police. "We almost arrested the son of Judge Wolin as the Baby-Faced Bandit. The judge has been assigned to this district and will move here next month."

Ruth had nothing to say as she squeezed Ben's hand a little harder. "And all's well that ends well," she thought as she moved closer to him.
